

Broadband over power lines should be promoted in rural areas where other forms of broadband are not available. In these places, radio interference would not be a significant problem even if it proves to be an issue in more densely populated areas. The unfortunate fact is that in many places, the only possible current source for broadband is the power lines.